

Welcome to Ron's Notebook

I created Ron's Notebook because I'm not really much of a Facebook or X person. I work in too many different directions to squeeze everything I want to talk about into one conventional social-media account.

This is where I'll talk about things that aren't necessarily directly related to Project Dwarf Goats—or, for that matter, limited to any one project at all. Technology, computers, radio, gaming, things I'm building, things I'm thinking about, and whatever else happens to end up in the notebook are all fair game.

I also want to clarify something about the word hacker. When I use that term, especially in reference to myself, I mean it in the traditional code-hacker/tinkerer sense: someone who likes understanding systems, experimenting with them, modifying code, and making things work. I'm not using it to mean someone breaking into other people's systems.

And one Project Dwarf Goats clarification while I'm here: Dwarf Goats is the development codename. I'm still working on the actual operating-system name, and that will come later.

This kind of space is simply a better fit for me than conventional social media. If the things I work on or think about interest you, this is where you'll find the more personal side of it.

As the site continues to evolve, the distinction is straightforward: PromptForge.social is the technical/social side of the ecosystem, while AgenticCodeAI.com is where the actual projects live.
